

Cocaine is a major industry in Colombia. People grow coca to make cocaine in the country's lush jungle, and in the cities of Medellin, Cali, and Bogota, drug dealers hawk their products on the sidewalks and in slum neighborhoods. The cocaine trade ruined the economy in the '80s and '90s, killed more than half a million people, caused environmental damage, and forced two million people to leave their homes.

Colombia's government is trying to clean up its image, but that doesn't mean it has a firm grip on the cocaine business. Special agent teams raid drug labs with mortars and grenade launchers. Airplanes drop chemicals that kill coca plants by the hectare. And yet finding cocaine in Colombia is still relatively easy. In most cities, taxi drivers will offer it to you unprompted and outside discotecas, chewing gum and tobacco hawkers sling blow for ten bucks a gram.

In a community in central Colombia, villagers rise early nearly every morning to pick the coca leaves that will become cocaine. They scrape the brittle branches until their hands bleed. They turn the leaves into coca paste that smugglers will use to make cocaine for the world's rich and powerful. But when cocaine markets in the United States and Western Europe sank two years ago, the money dried up in these impoverished communities.

The gangs that control the cocaine trade in Colombia have begun to diversify their market, seeking out buyers in Asia and Africa with strong middle classes and virgin markets ripe for the picking. They haven't forgotten Pablo Escobar or the hundreds of thousands of end-users who created his business, but they are betting that drug prohibitions won't last in the era of big data and sophisticated technology.
